

THE LEGEND OF ZELDA PAGE

This HTML/CSS/Javascript web page has been made using bootstrap 5, a front-end open source toolkit. I took from it the navbar (with a dropdown menu), the hero section carousel with fade animation, the card elements, an accordion, list groups, modals and popper library tooltips. I used utilities like p or m and the grid and flex-box propperties, too

I use favicon, and fontawesome4 link to use its icons in my page. The links to use them were provided by our Mark Up Language Subject teacher Pilar González.

The estructure of the page is like this;

- Navbar with all the sections with actives links on it.
- A Carousel with fade animation. Three images form it edited by me.
- An introduction section.
- A section where there are cards of each videogame. This sections is divided in three parts. The first part corresponds to the 20 principal videogames. Each card lead to a modal has the name, the release date, the consoles where the game is available, a gameplay image and a description.
The second and the third part are in an accordion. The second one is to Spin-Offs (12 games) and the third one to Other Apparitions of the franchise (3 games). You can open each accordeon section clicking on its respective dropdown menu link to arrive there directly when you open the page.
Each card has a tooltip that show you that you can click there.
- The next section explains the chronology of the franchise, ordering all the 20 videogames we talked in the previous section.
- Other section with curiosities of the franchise.
- The last section, which is a footer with information about me and about Nintendo, the developer and distributor of The Legend of Zelda.

The images with background were edited by me. My Zelda's collection and the screenshot of my old page were made by me. I requested a friend to take me a picture on Prague and that photo is my property. The rest of the images, ones were taken of the old page and others are new, but all them provided by an important member of Nintendo called Juan Antonio Gálvez which is a friend of mine.
